A photograph of a hallway with a large wall-mounted artwork. The artwork consists of numerous vertical lines in various colors (red, green, blue, yellow) and contains text in different languages, including English and Spanish. The hallway has a tiled floor and recessed ceiling lights.

My Takeaway from Andrea Bowers

The construction of the Dakota Access Pipeline requires funding, and the majority of the funding comes from banks that invest it into oil companies. If I want to make a change and protest against unsustainable environmental policies like this DAPL, I should be aware of what my bank's beliefs are set upon. Are they investing against or for better environmental policies? I also realized that art and environmental activism do go hand-in-hand with one another because it can help poetry a sense of activism towards sustainable policies.

Personally I would not change my credit union. This is because they are "For people, Not profit." North Orange County's Credit Union is a member owned entity, rather than stockholder ownership, which allows it to be more attentive to community-based issues.

Smithsonian: Practice What You Print

I chose this action because I find it ironic that the Smithsonian is all about environmental education and activism, yet they're not practicing it with their magazines. The Smithsonian is a huge role model, when it comes to the environment, therefore, they should remember to set an example with every action they make. Hopefully the Smithsonian will recognize this unsustainable practice, and enact change.

SKIP THE SLIP

Sure physical receipts may help keep you in check with spending and sure they may help you when you're buying presents for others. but the big problem is that they also create lots of waste. Try to limit yourself and instead of getting a paper receipt for every purchase opt for an electronic receipt. Simply declining a paper receipt can also help reduce paper waste. Who doesn't want to keep their forests intact?
