Day 1: Books, magazines, manuals, notebooks, copies

Documents that are not used in more than six months, papers stored in boxes and desks.

Study papers initially

Order process and final result

I live in a house with many other students, we spend a lot of paper every day and every week, every semester we buy several books and get many copies.

I have lived in this house for two years and always when the semester ends we all collect what we use throughout the semester, the important papers are saved; but the rest is selected and ordered: books to create our own library, books that can be sold because they are in good condition, old books that need to be taken for recycling, magazines or manuals and papers that have at least one side of the sheet clean (These papers are ordered in a box and kept for the next semester to take notes or study). We also keep our notebooks for colleagues who need notes or assignments. We always do this before we go to our homes, no blank sheet of paper is thrown away.

IDEA

While I made this challenge I had an idea: I would like to talk with other houses where my friends live so they can do the same activity, not only with their books, but also with their clothes and utensils that they no longer use or want to sell or exchange. This would be a spectacular alternative, because university students sometimes do not have the money to buy books or totally new appliances. An application or a system where any student can learn to acquire something that needs to improve not only the economy of all but the quality of life. This is better to have so many things stored in boxes without any use.
