Do you think such a network would be beneficial to you and to your fellow student leaders?

Project Green Network would be the best thing that could happen. I know that when PGC is done, I'm going to be super sad because I won't have anything that can really open my eyes anymore about being eco- friendly and sustainable. Continuing PGC in a different way could be like a job promotion; we can continue to grow as people and as leaders for sustainability and promote our practices to other people. If there is a network that can help us further pursue sustainability and environmental practices, we want in! We want to continue to take action and spread the word. I don't know about a lot of people, but for me at least, if there is structure within my life, I know I will do much better than if there isn't something holding everything together. This network could be the glue that gives me structure and helps me move forward, rather than at a stand still.

Would you have an interest in joining or taking a leadership role in such a network bringing together student leaders from all over the world working for positive change?

I would love to take a leadership position. I consider myself a leader, not a follower, and PGC has helped me with that understanding. I know this generation and the generations that follow mine have potential, but we need to unlock that potential and show them it's there. With this network, we just might be able to do that. The power is in the students. We need to use our voices, because we are the future and we are the now. My generation has bright minds, and we can use those minds to make a positive change in the world. I see these minds every day, and I know a lot of people do too. This network could be where those people create something powerful- for the good of our world.

What do you imagine that might look like and how might you be willing/able to contribute?

It's hard to imagine the future, but I hope it will look like a group of students meeting up and deciding the action plans, not the adults. I imagine it kind of like a United Nations meeting- all of us at our desks with our names and countries on them, discussing topics, brainstorming, working. I imagine us making a real change, not just in small communities, but nations. I imagine us telling news reporters and broadcasting networks of our achievements and of what we want to accomplish; this isn't because we want to be famous( although one can dream) it's about us, as youth leaders, to spread the word about what we're doing. What good is us doing anything if people don't know about it? I can contribute what other leaders can contribute: ideas, knowledge, experiences. But, it isn't just about what I as an individual can contribute, but about what all of the student leaders can come up with together. After all, more heads means more ideas.

The Big Question

Are we all in?

The answer: YES! We are 100% ready to get down and dirty, to share ideas, to enact change, to meet others with just as much passion and drive.
