Day 19 Greener

1. I want to put a white board above my desk so I can make quick notes and reminders. I saw a DIY project on Pinterest using picture frames and turning it into a white board. I am going to find a picture frame from my house or get a cheap one at Goodwill. Then I can use a fun picture or pattern in the frame to serve as my background. Then I'm all set for my whiteboard. This is a sustainable project because it requires little to no extra materials that I don't already have at home. And it helps me save paper by writing on the white board instead of sticky notes.

2. I was looking for a new nightstand for my bedroom, and I found one on Facebook marketplace. This nightstand is only $25. It's sustainable because I'm buying it from someone else. So instead of that person throwing it away and me buying a brand-new item, I can repurpose what this person already had.

3. My roommate and I have been looking for a doormat for a while now, and I just found one on Facebook marketplace. This doormat is repurposed from someone else. It's always better to buy used items, so you aren't wasting a perfectly good item.

4. I love taking pictures and displaying them in my room. I found this DIY project on Pinterest to hang pictures. This project is simple and only involves a small rod and string. I can print pictures and hang them on the string that is wrapped around the rod. This is a more sustainable option that buying a new picture frame that could be expensive or not made sustainably.

5. I was looking for a way to add cute accent pieces in my apartment and these mason jars are perfect. I can take old mason jars, that I already have, and paint them however I want. I could add in some fresh flowers or other decorations too. This is sustainable because it requires little to no materials, and I'm reusing glass jars.
