Two things that left an impression:

I was very surprised that Fair Trade really tries to make a difference, not only in terms of quality, environment and worker rights, but they also have a very strong social commitment to promote the development of vulnerable communities.

Also, as a resident of Latin America, I am saddened to learn that only 80% of world trade takes place between countries of the North, 4% is South-South trade, and the rest is North-South trade.

Another fact that caught my attention was the explanation of the way in which a price is assigned to the products.

Although many of the products get their ingredients from the same place, products without fair trade certification usually transport them through many countries to finish manufacturing and usually have no social commitment. It showed me why it is important to look for environmentally friendly products that also improve the lives of small producers and farmers.

Fair Trade is a global trade model and certification allows buyers to quickly identify products that were produced ethically. Today we share the types of fair trade labeling and a comparison of some products that meet this model

Although some of its raw materials have the same area of origin, much of the products without these characteristics are manufactured in many different countries and do not usually prioritize their social and environmental commitment, That's why, as consumers, we must support products that are not only sustainable, but also greatly support vulnerable communities and offer quality ingredients
