

Anáhuac Mayab University

Username: WeareGreenUp

Journal: PGC Day 8

Dr. Johnson's choice to use "possibility" instead of hope, is something I found perfect and something I can comprehend so well. The thing is yesterday I was listening to this voice clip from a podcast talking about hope, in terms of life, not climate itself. And in that short clip they shared the perspective that hope is something that weighs us down, because it is looking towards something that doesn't exist, instead of what we have. The point is a little bit more involved, but I was thinking about that from a "scientific" view point, or more specifically, from a climate change view point. And I interpreted as hope is still useless for the same reasons, and it is actually possibilities that we as people have. Which is basically what Dr. Johnson was talking about, which mind blew me. I expected her to talk about the importance of hope or something like that, but I respected her stand of using the word "possibility" instead of "hope". It is more realistic and I think that is important when confronting these issues, because I don't think "hope" should be the only motivation.

Link for Instagram post:

https://www.instagram.com/p/DPkvTHeDQ7O/?utm_source=ig_web_copy_link&igsh =MzRIODBiNWFIZA==

DECIDE YOUR LEGACY

A BRIGHTER FUTURE EVERYONE WORKING TOWARDS WHAT WE WANT

